Dear Hiring Manager,

I am applying for the position you have listed on LinkedIn titled "Senior Software Engineer". This posting is a dream job for me.

I am seasoned software professional with 37 of experience. My first love is developing for Apple hardware, especially iPhone. I have been an iOS developer full-time the past three years, and part-time for six years before that at Indeed. I also have experience with iOS before my tenure there.

Indeed's Job Search app is currently listed as the #2 business app on Apple's App Store. It is a hybrid app, with core is based on WKWebView connecting to Indeed's main web site, but there are also many features implemented natively. These features are mostly implemented with SwiftUI, but a few with UIKit, and some in ReactNative. The native and ReactNative features call APIs implemented by Indeed, which are mostly implemented in GraphQL.

As far as I can tell from your job listing, MLB's app is similarly mostly native, with some integration of WKWebView. I imagine the GameDay panel is a WKWebView, and all of the action implemented in a JavaScript-based framework.

As part of the iOS team at Indeed, I have done extensive work in SwiftUI developing native features. I have also instrumented performance and reliability metrics with Datadog, worked on low level startup code, and spent a lot of time working with concurrency.

Your job listing also mentioned one of the responsibilities being "A baseball fan". I have been an avid fan since the Bucky Dent game in 1978, following the Yankees as they won the ALCS and the World Series that year. The next year, the Houston Astros moved their broadcasts to a new TV station that my house could receive, and I became a lifelong Astros fan.

In the late eighties, I participated heavily in Project Scoresheet. If there had been positions in front offices for statistically-minded people like me, I would have applied for them. I moved to the Bay Area in 1988 and followed the Astros from afar. In 2000, when the Oakland A's started being good, I became a season ticket holder. It was a thrill to be at every home game of their historic 20-game win streak in 2002! I gave that up when I moved to Austin in 2006.

In 1994, I drove to see all 26 major league stadiums in existence at the time. The Kingdome had issues, and I had to cancel going there (I had seen it in 1993 anyway), but I saw everywhere else in 11 weeks. It was the trip of a lifetime.

In short, I am a huge baseball fan and an experienced iOS developer currently working on a complex app that looks to be similar to yours. I am a great candidate for your position. Please consider me.

Sincerely,

Syd Polk
